Title:

"Gender as an Emotional Situation"

Abstract:

With the emergence of new forms of gender variance, developing forms of community accompaniment provide gender non-conforming children with emancipatory possibilities. Medical interventions lean on the approval of a healthcare professional, and it is at this stage that the analyst is called upon to act as gatekeeper, that is, to decide whether the demand for transitioning —the initiation of hormonal treatment or surgery as well as requests for name or pronoun change—should be supported. The transitioning youth's demands for recognition and/or support for initiation of medical intervention may push against the analyst's theories of gender as this challenge traditional understanding of sexual identity, now increasingly understood as overdetermined. In this paper I focus on the emotional situation created by the analyst's confrontation with new subjectivities in the clinic—trans and nonbinary children and adolescents—about which there may be no prior knowledge to lean upon. In addressing concerns regarding the analyst's stance in relation to trans youth's demands to transition, I specifically focus on two papers recently published by the International Journal of Psychoanalysis: David Bell's article "First do no Harm" (2020) as well as Rachel Blass's paper "Can we think psychoanalytically about transgenderism?" With attention to a series of metaphors and signifiers such as contagion, castration/amputation and disruption that recur through the debates, I ask, what do these apparently disparate metaphors and signifiers reveal about the anxieties in the field regarding these new clinical situations? And how do these new situations change the nature of our work?
